

Doc. Zvonimir Galic - What makes a good boss? New methods for identifying organizational leaders

Associate Professor at Department of psychology, Faculty of humanities and social sciences, University of Zagreb

Managers or organizational leaders are responsible for motivating their employees, making good decisions, and building teams that produce results over time. They are crucial for success and development of companies as well as for motivation and well-being of their subordinates. Still, recent research shows that about half of managers are unsuccessful in their jobs and either resign or get fired. Moreover, some studies showed that important decisions by top managers in at least 50 % of cases result with failure. Irrespective of the type of industry or exact level of the position in an organizational hierarchy, the reasons for managerial derailment are typically related to some psychosocial competencies and aspects of their personality.

We believe that leaders affect organizations through a set of psychological characteristics that make their leadership potential, and in turn determine their performance. Within this talk, I will present our latest research in which we tried to identify the key of psychological competencies and aspects of personality that make someone a good organizational leader. I will also present some of the instruments we have been developing in order to assess this key psychological characteristics.

Managers or organizational leaders are responsible for motivating their employees, making good decisions, and building teams that produce results over time. They are crucial for success and development of companies as well as for motivation and well-being of their subordinates. Still, recent research shows that about half of managers are unsuccessful in their jobs and either resign or get fired. Moreover, some studies showed that important decisions by top managers in at least 50 % of cases result with failure. Irrespective of the type of industry or exact level of the position in an organizational hierarchy, the reasons for managerial derailment are typically related to some psychosocial competencies and aspects of their personality.

We believe that leaders affect organizations through a set of psychological characteristics that make their leadership potential, and in turn determine their performance. Within this talk, I will present our latest research in which we tried to identify the key of psychological competencies and aspects of personality that make someone a good organizational leader. I will also present some of the instruments we have been developing in order to assess this key psychological characteristics.